Kendo is Japanese fencing. Centuries ago some Samurai decided it was more fun and safer to practice swordplay with bamboo swords instead of steel swords. Jo is into kendo in a big way. A black belt in karate by the time she was twelve, Jo starting looking for a new challenge. She found it in kendo-Japanese swordsmanship.

Now Jo's parents are pretty cool. They sent her to Japan for summer vacation to study under Osaki Yoritomo, Japan's greatest kendo master. Jo was jazzed until she got off the plane in Tokyo. Osaki sensei had green hair and called himself

"Bob". Wouldn't you wonder if your "great sword teacher" looked like some psycho-cyberpunk with green hair? It gets better.

Bob starts ranting about all your special psychic powers and how it's your duty to banish evil from the world. Then he hands you the Zopikki talisman. Kind of neat but it turns you into some kind of retro 70's super hero. Bob might be the greatest sword master of all time, but he's not a fashion designer. Bob is either crazy or a genius, but you know this will be the weirdest summer vacation of all time.

Kendo, the way of the sword, has a long history in Japan. Thousands of years ago Japanese warriors studied Kenjutsu, the Art of Sword, to hone their martial skills. As civil wars in feudal Japan heated up the study of the swordsmanship became more important. Skilled swordsmen opened their own dojos gym to train samurai in the art of fighting.

As you can guess training with a live blade was just as dangerous as combat! Finally a great master developed a bamboo sword to train with. This allowed a warrior to work on form and style without the threat of injury. Over the years Kendo has become a full fledged sport with a growing international following.
